Group: Beachgoers at risk from polluted water

MIAMI (Reuters) — An environmental group said on Wednesday it would sue the U.S. government for failing to protect millions of beachgoers from contaminated water.

The Natural Resources Defense Council said the Environmental Protection Agency has moved too slowly to update beach water quality standards and protect people from diarrhea, skin rashes, earaches, pink eye, respiratory infections and other ailments from polluted water.

The agency missed an October 2005 deadline mandated by Congress to revise outdated water quality standards and says it will not be able to finish the job until 2011, the group said.

"A day at the beach is not worth a night at the hospital," Nancy

A surfer walks along the shore at Surfrider Beach Wednesday in Malibu, Calif. Seven of California's 10 most polluted beaches, including Surfrider, are in or near Los Angeles County, according to the report released by Heal the Bay.

The Natural Resources Defense Council said it had served the EPA with a notice of its intent to sue in 60 days.

The EPA issued a statement that did not address the NRDC's claim that it missed Congressional deadlines, but said the agency had developed a "strong beach program" and distributed more than $52 million to states for monitoring programs.

The EPA said the number of beaches monitored has more than tripled since 1997.

The lawsuit will seek to force the EPA to accelerate its timetable for setting new water quality standards and strengthen those standards to "fully protect the public" from bacteria, viruses and parasites in beach water, the group said.

Stoner, the director of group's clean water project, said during a telephone news conference five days before Memorial Day, the traditional beginning of the U.S. beach season.

The EPA also needs to set standards for facilities that discharge contaminated water, such as sewage treatment plants, it said. In addition, the EPA should establish testing methods that allow public health officials to quickly decide whether to close beaches or advise people against swimming.

"A new beach test is undergoing development to provide information about water quality in two hours or less," the EPA said in its response.

Current outdated standards may not protect beachgoers from illnesses such as hepatitis and encephalitis as well as a host of common stomach ailments and infections, the NRDC said.

The EPA needs to put breakthrough technologies in microbiology -- the kind seen on TV crime shows -- to work detecting pollutants at beaches, said Dr. Joan Rose, director of Michigan State University's Center for Water Sciences.

"We are essentially using about 100-year-old methods, particularly when we monitor discharges that end up at our beaches," Rose said.

Poor teens more likely to be overweight

CHICAGO (Reuters) — The link between poverty and being overweight first shows up among 15- to 17-year-olds as children become freer to choose fattening soft drinks and avoid breakfast and exercise, a study said on Tuesday.

The prevalence of overweight adolescents has doubled in the United States over the past three decades, and overweight children have higher risks of diabetes, high blood pressure and potentially fatal illnesses when they reach adulthood, study author Richard Miech from Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore said.

Based on U.S. National Health and Nutrition Examination Surveys through 2004, the study found 23 percent of 15- to 17-year-olds from poor families were overweight, compared with 14 percent of non-poor in that age group — regardless of race or gender.

The proportion of poor and non-poor children who were overweight was about the same among 12- to 14-year-olds.

Older children tend to be more autonomous and free to choose what they eat and do, Miech wrote in the Journal of the American Medical Association.

The study found poor children were significantly more likely to get more calories from soft drinks than non-poor children. They were also more likely to skip breakfast and engage in less physical activity, contributing to the gap, it said.

States plot how to handle pandemic flu threat

TOPEKA, Kansas (Reuters) — Kansans are practicing using a football field-sized tent as a portable hospital. Hawaii plans to find the sick by doing nasal swabs on tourists, and Seattle is issuing instructions on how to bury the dead.

Across the United States, local and state officials are spending millions of dollars to plot strategies for dealing with a still hypothetical — but experts say inevitable — pandemic flu crisis forecast to kill upwards of 2 million Americans.

The fears are tied to the current spread of a deadly strain of avian influenza known as H5N1 that has surfaced in Asia, Europe and Africa.

"There is no cookbook for pandemic. There is no one who says this is how this works," said Tod Bunting, who leads Kansas' emergency management operations, including the state's National Guard troops, who would be on the front lines of pandemic response. "The picture is unclear but we're just going to have to plan as best we can and then go with the flow."

The H5N1 avian influenza virus has infected at least 224 people in 10 countries and killed 127 of them, according to the World Health Organization. Experts evaluating the spread of this type of avian influenza believe it will ultimately mutate into a strain that could pass easily from person to person, sparking a pandemic that could sweep the globe in weeks or months.

The United States has not yet seen a case of H5N1, either in fowl or in a human, according to the Department of Health and Human Services. But federal officials have spent the past few months criss-crossing the country, warning of the possibilities of pandemic and pushing states to come up with plans for how to handle a deadly flu outbreak if it strikes.

"We are overdue and we are under-prepared," HHS Deputy Secretary Alex Azar told a group of Kansas emergency responders at a meeting in Topeka last week. "The more and better we prepare, the more lives we will save."

Azar said the federal government won't be able to provide a safety net if a pandemic hits. States will have to rely on their own ingenuity to provide health care, keep essential services operating and distribute food and medicines.

The state efforts have been augmented with $100 million in federal money so far, including $1.2 million earmarked for Kansas. HHS will distribute another $250 million to states later this year, according to Azar.

Taking the concerns to heart, community leaders and local and state officials have a mix of plans on the drawing board.

In Hawaii, officials at the Honolulu airport are planning to have nurses take nasal swabs of airline passengers who appear ill to screen them for the flu, and a jetload of people could be quarantined if any one passenger tested positive for the H5N1 strain, according to the Hawaii State Department of Health.

In Boston, thousands of healthcare professionals are being asked to sign up as volunteers for a "Medical Reserve Corps" who could help treat flu victims.

In Illinois, the DuPage County Health Department, which encompasses 1 million people in suburbs west of Chicago, last month sent out a mailer to 350,000 homes warning residents of pandemic flu and offering tips on how to personally prepare,

The county is also planning outreach kits to businesses, churches and schools along with a series of conferences in the fall, and it is launching a bird flu Web site.

"People are concerned and are asking for information," said DuPage County Health Department spokesman Dave Hass.

In South Carolina, representatives from all state agencies are meeting monthly with American Red Cross volunteers and other volunteer organizations to develop a plan of action.

The Muhlenberg College in Allentown, Pennsylvania is readying technology and personnel to transform the college quickly into a command center capable of handling hundreds of hotline calls should pandemic hit.

And in Washington state, the King County public health department in Seattle has warned people that if body bags and refrigerated trucks are in short supply, flu victims should be buried in backyards, provided the graves are far from septic systems.

In Kansas, where state officials estimate a pandemic would claim some 2,500 lives, military units in Topeka spent last weekend practicing an emergency setup of the state's "EMEDS" (expeditionary medical support system), a portable system of tents that was deployed for use along the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina. The system is designed to accommodate 25 intensive care beds, a surgical wing and a pharmacy. Another EMEDS is on order and the state anticipates it would be critical in handling waves of flu patients.

"We have never really had a public emergency of this magnitude in our lifetime," said Bunting. "But we can rally the country to win this thing. We can do this."

Pope, following criticism, condemns anti-Semitism

VATICAN CITY (Reuters) — Pope Benedict, speaking after some Jewish groups complained that his recent speech at the Auschwitz former Nazi concentration camp was not strong enough, on Wednesday explicitly condemned anti-Semitism.

The 79-year-old German Pope made his comments at his weekly general audience in a speech recalling his four-day trip to Poland last week to pay homage to his predecessor John Paul.

Wednesday's address appeared to be at least in part a response to some of the criticism leveled by Jews who said he should have been more specific and less theological at Auschwitz.

"In the Auschwitz-Birkenau camp, as in other similar ones, Hitler ordered the extermination

Pope Benedict XVI waves to the faithful during his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square at the Vatican, Wednesday. AP of more than six million Jews," he told tens of thousands of people in St Peter's Square.

"In Auschwitz-Birkenau, 150,000 Poles were also killed, along with tens of thousands of men and women of other nationalities," he said.

"Today's humanity must not forget Auschwitz and the other 'factories of death' where the Nazi regime tried to eliminate God in order to take his place," he said. "Humanity must not give in to the temptation of racial hatred, which is at the origin of the worst forms of anti-Semitism."

Ending a four-day pilgrimage to Poland on Sunday, the Pontiff reflected on how hard it was for a German to visit the former Nazi death camp and how challenging the evil committed there was for anyone who believed in a loving God.

In his speech at the camp, he called himself "a son of Germany" and asked why God was silent when 1.5 million victims, mostly Jews, died "in this place of horror."

At the camp, the Pope twice used the word "shoah," the Hebrew term for the Holocaust, and said that the leaders of the Third Reich wanted to "crush the entire Jewish people and ban them from the register of the peoples of the earth."

But some Jewish leaders faulted him for not clearly mentioning anti-Semitism, others for saying Germany was taken over by criminals in the 1930s, as if Hitler had not had any popular support.

"We are deeply troubled by the Pontiff's failure to explicitly address the vicious anti-Semitism that led to the murder of more than 1.5 million Jews on the ground where he stood," Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, said in a statement.

Lithuanian gov't falls after coalition party quits

VILNIUS (Reuters) — The Lithuanian government fell on Wednesday after Labor, the biggest party in the minority coalition, withdrew following allegations of misuse of party and state funds by senior Labor politicians.

Lengthy efforts are now expected to build a new coalition, failing which fresh elections would have to be held.

Analysts said the European Union's decision earlier this month not to allow Lithuania to join the euro zone in early 2007 because of its high inflation rate had weakened the government significantly, without actually precipitating its fall.

Outgoing Prime Minister Algirdas Brazauskas was a major force behind the push to adopt the euro, repeatedly emphasizing the importance of the government's timetable and putting his political capital on the line.

Whatever new government emerges, analysts expect little if any change in the pro-western foreign policy of the Baltic state, which joined the European Union and NATO in 2004.

Brazauskas, 73, a political veteran who transformed himself from Lithuania's last communist leader into one of its first democratic presidents and later prime minister, said he was considering retiring from politics.

"I think the time has come for a new and younger generation to take over, I have been prime minister for five years, which has been enough," he told a news conference.

Analysts said the most likely outcome of political talks in the coming weeks was the re-emergence of Brazauskas's Social Democrats, the second largest coalition partner, at the core of a fresh government but under a new leader.

"The president will have to act as a political broker and discuss possible candidates for the prime minister's job with political parties," said political scientist Mindaugas Jurkynas.

Brazauskas did not refer to the delay in adopting the euro, but analysts said the new government was likely to retain the goal of joining the common currency as soon as possible.

Brussels said earlier this month it would not allow Lithuania to join the euro as planned in early 2007 because it had failed to meet EU rules on curbing inflation.

Brazauskas said the proposed sale by the Russian oil group YUKOS of its majority 53.7 percent stake in the Lithuanian oil refinery Mazeikiu Nafta to the Polish group PKN Orlen, approved by the government last Friday, would still go ahead.
